Interesting Items Gathered by our Correspondents

AN EXPLANATION.

Editor Tribune:—In your issue of January 28, 1910, I notice an article which attempts to misconstrue the item I, as your correspondent, sent to your paper. The third word in line ten, "lady" should be, and my copy will show was "body". No reflection was intended to be cast on Mr. or Mrs. Ed. Meyer. It is true that they did not get home that night, the roads being blocked with snow and they were compelled to cross woods, pastures and fields, which is no disgrace and no malice was meant toward anybody. The whole article was meant as a joke and when properly read will be so construed by all right thinking people. The statement in your columns, by Ed. Meyer and J. W. Tellor, that I wrote the article out of malice, is incorrect, and I wish to say malice is a thing I hold toward no one and I think no christian person can rightfully say that of me. As to my reputation for truthfulness, peace and quietude I respectfully refer all to my many friends and acquaintances.

Respectfully,

Mrs. Lou Bentley.

[We trust that the above statement will end the dispute and end all animosities.—Editor.]

Manure Spreaders

ON THE MARKET

Have a number on hand and will make
Prices and Terms Equal to Competitors.

The average farmer understands that he should have a spreader. He knows that it will improve the producing value of his land from 30 to 40 per cent. That it will spread a load of manure in a few minutes. That a boy in spreading can do the work of a man. That his manure will cover twice as many acres, and do it better and more effectually. That he can distribute commercial fertilizers or ashes, as well as barnyard manure. That he can regulate the thickness of the layer to the needs of his land. The real question with him is picking out the right spreader. Generally he takes the one he has read the most about and which he has seen proved in his neighbor's fields. That centers his choice on either the CORN KING, or the CLOVERLEAF. That is my line. The Cloverleaf has an endless apron, the Corn King has quick return apron and clutch unknown to others. Each style is made in all sizes demanded by large and small farmers. The lumber used is air-dried from two to four years. The metal parts are made of flawless iron and steel. Moving parts have friction eliminating bearings. Front trucks turn under the bed. Light draft—easy on horses—simple mechanism—easy on driver. THIS IS YOUR CHANCE.
